I'm opposed to the FCC adopting any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law protection. Indiana's law pretty much ended the annoying solicitation calls I received almost every day and many times several times a day. If I was home sick from work and trying to rest, the telephone was ringing with unwanted calls. I didn't feel comfortable turning off the ringer, because my family might need me. Since implementation of Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law, I only receive an occasional call from those campaigning for political office or from colleges and universities trying to raise funds. This is acceptable. In my opinion, Indiana has an effective law in place and it should not be preempted by a lower national standard.
